

Introduction to unwritten rules for The Corner Parking Lot Subculture

The fellows who work at the Corner Parking Lot have many unwritten rules. They most likely don't write these rules because "normal" people might think they are offensive. For example, their rules about dealing with rude customers are the opposite of how most businesses act. Instead of saying that the customer is always right, they believe the employees are always right. When a customer complains or doesn't pay enough, the employee yells at them, tells them to take their medicine, or runs after them and throws things at their cars.

Most of the employees are really smart, but they seem like slackers. To match their attitude, one of the rules is not to wear nice clothing to work.
